Mediator Style &amp; Process Preferences	Mediation is an extraordinarily powerful process. It repairs severed relationships and achieves for its parties a "just result" as they themselves define that term. When undertaken in good faith by committed participants, and when assisted by a neutral dedicated to thoroughly and creatively exploring every potentiality for agreement, disputes once believed unable to be settled, can be, and most often are, resolved to the satisfaction of the parties. I am committed to working creatively and tirelessly to help similarly committed parties explore every potentiality for resolution of their dispute. I am cognizant of, and respectful of, the principle that parties choose ADR (and, particularly, mediation) because it works swiftly, efficiently and economically. My formal training is as a facilitator. However, I believe a mediator's evaluation can often move the matter forward, when all parties desire his evaluation. My successes are divided approximately equally between facilitative and evaluative roles. I bring commitment, passion, energy, creativity, and positive thinking to the mediation table. I am hopeful that participants will also bring these qualities, as well as their good faith, to that table, too.
