| Mediator Style & ProcessPreferences       | A successful mediation requires parties who desire to resolve their dispute, sufficient knowledge ofthe facts, and a hard-working mediator. Once educated and armed with a full understanding of thelegal and factual issues that drive the dispute, I explore the parties' interests, sensitivities, and goals.I do that through a written submissions, joint meetings, and separate caucuses with the parties, andsometimes only with counsel. This exploration, coupled with the exchange of proposals and counter-proposals, may reveal of an area or areas of possible agreement. In further narrowing the area ofpossible agreement, I may suggest, when appropriate, settlement structures, options, or ranges. Imay also employ a more evaluative approach. There are certain occasions when a mediator'sconcerns or questions regarding a claim or issue may assist a party in reaching a more realistic ormore definitive assessment of its position. But more important than specific steps or techniques isthe need to develop of sense of partnership and shared purpose with each party and its counsel.Mediation is much more than shuttle diplomacy. Accordingly, I strive to work on behalf of and buildtrust with each party, fairly and equally, to reach an acceptable resolution. |
